Now, here's a book that has probably never seen a day resting on the shelf since I'd purchased it when our oldest grandson was 2 years old (now 7-1/2, with a couple of more grandsons added in the interim!) Obviously the book (recommended age of 3+) wasn't intended for a child that young (it includes a black dry erase marker in a nifty slot at the top of the book, held by a clip, that you wouldn't want in the hands of a 2 year old), but I hid the marker until he was ready, and this is just a terrific book for so many purposes... it shows the "normal" way of printing upper and lower case letters (sometimes I've found that these types of books don't display letters the way kids will learn to write in school, which annoys me because I think it just confuses them), with one page devoted to each letter, photos showing how the letters are used in words, along with some activities - great both for teaching letter and object recognition to younger kids, and perfect for learning to write letters as they get a bit older. For example, the "B" page - it features both an upper and lower case "B" at the top of the page, around which are a small dot showing where to begin writing the letter and a perforated arrow showing the direction in which you draw the first line, a small "x" indicating where the next step begins and again the perforated arrow; then there are a couple of perforated upper case and lower case "B"s for your youngster to trace. The photos shown are a ball, brush, baby and bib, with the "b"s in each of them perforated for tracing. There's also a little area that says "Circle all of the 'b's.
